

Globalization: Historical Constructs & Ideologies, Interpreting Globalization from an Eco-Political Perspective

Globalization is the process by which, throughout time, cultures, economies and societies have become integrated globally into a sort of network meant to equally distribute and enhance all areas of trade, technology, and cultural advances. It is the reason that a person can travel to India and get a McDonalds Big Mac, or in larger terms, be in America and purchase a Japanese-made automobile with technology different from straight American-made models. It is also the reason that cultures, throughout the past hundred years, have begun to mesh, complement each other, and form new advancements that never would have previously been achieved. With that said, this paper will define the positive aspects of globalization and explain how the interactions of cultures throughout history have led to the Eurocentric ideology of imperialism and despite minor short-term effects, how a universal and global dialogue has impacted the creation of modern-day advancements.

GLOBALIZATION: CONSTRUCTS & IDEOLOGIES, INTERPRETING GLOBALIZATION FROM A HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE defines the process by which, throughout time, economies, cultures, and societies have become integrated into a universal network of sharing meant to equally distribute and enhance all areas of technology, trade, and societal and cultural advances. As one author found himself in India, facing buildings and a culture he knew as his own, it has become clear that globalization has had a profound impact on the world as it is known today. Cultures and societies of the past showed significant access of the globalization ideology, but it wasn't until the early 1900s that people used globalization to their societys advantage in terms of effective communication. After defining the aspects of globalization throughout history, it becomes clear that while some aspects of globalization and instigations of imperialism can have negative impacts, for the short-term, upon a culture, in the long-term, globalization offers a unique and positive way to level the playing field, to flatten the world, to achieve and grow in the company of others to make advancements that would not be conceived if it weren't for the global dialogue that has been created.
